Summary of reasons for decision:

The publication is part of a consignment of similar publications submitted by a Senior Inspector of Publications of the Department of Internal Affairs Censorship Compliance Unit. The publications consist of a large number of pencil drawings and two handwritten stories created by an inmate in secure care at a mental health institution. Each publication explicitly depicts or describes the sexual abuse of children or young persons. The publications are therefore deemed to be objectionable.

Section 23(3) of the FVPC Act allows a publication that would otherwise be classified as objectionable to be classified as a restricted publication in order that it may be made available to particular persons for professional purposes. The Department of Internal Affairs have requested that a condition be attached to the classification of each publication submitted to allow the material to be held by the National Intellectual Disability Secure Service for the purpose of assisting with the assessment and future care of the inmate. The Classification Office has therefore classified each publication as objectionable except under the conditions requested.

The New Zealand Bill of Rights Act 1990 requires that classification decisions be reasonable and demonstrably justified. In this instance, a publication that would in any other circumstance be classified as objectionable is restricted to a particular class of persons for professional purposes. The Classification Office is satisfied that the limitation on the freedom of expression that this classification represents is a sufficient restriction.
